A TROUBLESOME CARGO: Or Chosts at Sea.

BY AUSTIN C. BURDICK.

In the spring of 1837, I had command REFERENCES:-The Hon. Sir J. B. Rob- the old ship Lonorat, She was a staunch, Acon, flatt, Chief Justice, John Arnold; Esq., stout craft, and had stood many a knock that l cleared from New York with an assorted cargo for Liverpool, England; and at the latter place I took on board a load of all kinds of merchandize. There were bales of carpeting and cloth, boxes of machinery, cutlery of various kinds, and other things which it were useless to mention. Suffice it to say, that the ship's hold was well filled, though, from the nature and bulk of much of the cargo, it could not be stored so anugly as I should have liked. However, the season of my return to the States was a favorable one, and I had no fear of much rough weather, so I let the stowage go as it was, not being particular about chocking everything in its place.

After my cargo was all on board, and the hatches on, I waited at the dock four days, for For Whitchurch and Adjoining Townships. some passengers who had partly arranged with the agent for passage, but at the end of that Thatt'IES destring to secure his services can time we received notice that one of the party make application either personally or by letter, had been taken very sick, so I sailed with-

During the first week the weather was very fine, and the wind favorable, but at length days of rough weather. The wind blew from the north west and much rain come with it. Towards the close of the first day of the storm, I found it necessary to place the ship under close-reefed topsail, fore-staysail, and storm-mizzen. At night when the first watch was set, the ship was hove-to, and in that way she rode safely till morning, at which time the wind had lost much of its force, and the rain

"Captain," said my first mate, a noble hearted sailor, named Lenard Thomas, " this wind seemed to be going down some, but I don't believe we've seen the last of it, by any

" Perhaps not," I remarked casting my eye

"You see it has a tendency to reer now," he continued, "and I believe it'll settle down in the northeast, and come at us again."

I placed much confidence in my mate's judgement, for he had spent almost his whole lifetime in those latitudes, and he knew all the signs of weather perfectly. At any rate l made up my mind to expect another blow, and a harder one than that which we had already experienced. It was now about half-past five o'clock in the morning, and the wind was fulling every moment, but the clouds did not seen inclined to break much. While I stood there with the mate, some of the other watch came up from the forecastle, and I thought they looked nervous, and uneasy. One of the two of them I noticed looked very pale, and I saw them whisper together. I naturally supposed they were unwell and at once went forward.

"What's the matter Ben !" said I address. ing an old foretopman, and the best working seaman I had on board the ship. " Arnt you

"Yes captain," he replied. "O, yes." His tone sounded strange to me and I fancied it was tremulous. "You are not afraid of the old ship, I hope added. " She is good for a tough blow, yet,

"I know that," said Ben, with a dubious shake of the head.

"Then what is it ?" I asked, with considera able earnestness. "There is something the matter with you-all of you. Now out with

The old foretopman twisted himself uneasily about, and looked into the faces of his companions, and then he turned once more towards me, and having given his trowsers a hitch lie said : "Well, captain, I'll tell you; and as true as my name is Ben Hall, what I tell ye is gospel truth. There's ghosts aboard the ship !"

" Ghosta ?" repeated I, in surprise. "Ghosts ?" echoed the mate, smiling.

In truth, I knew not what to think, Of course I imagined there must be something, and that that something might be strange. The success. mate tried to laugh the man out of it.

"It was only the moving and rubbing of the boxes," he said.

"But boxes cant speak," retored Ben. sleep," was the mates explanation.

the matter rest for further developements. The wind continued to abate, and by eight o'clock it gave a fair top gallant breezo, but of course we had a heavy sea. Through the day the wind varied but very little, being out from the northward, and blowing steadily. At eight o'clock in the evening, when the first reefed topsails, and fore-staysails and spanker again, and then I turned in. Just after midnight the second mate, whose name was Baly, came into the cabin and told me that the noise had commenced again in the hold. I arose and threw on my coarse jacket, and then followed him on deck, where I found Ben Hall waiting for me at the wheel, and the rest of his watch with him. "Now, captain," he said "just you come down into the forecastle, and see for your-

I told him to lead on, and I followed .-There was quite a sea, and the ship rolled considerably-so much so that I had to seize hold upon several objects to keep myself on my feet. I found a condle burning in the forecastle, suspended from one of the beams by a wire frame but there were none of the men there save Ben, who had just gone down

"Now just you put your ear agin the bulkhead, an' listen," he whispered to me; " an' mind that you don't make any noise."

I followed his directions. There was a chest lashed against the bulkhead-and course it will be understood that this bulkhead separated the hold from the forecastle, being only a partition of inch boards neatly matched together. It sat down upon this chest and placed my ear to the partition. At the end of some moments I thought I heard a sort of shuffling sound-but then that might only be the movement of some bales or boxes. At length, however, I heard a different sound. It was a sort of a low moan, and did most surely have a human tone. I became interesed now, and listened attentively. Soon another moan broke upon my ear, and on the next instant I heard these words spoken :- " Don't for heaven's sake make such a noise or you'll have the whole ship's crew down on us!"

I do not think it strange that this startled me. I heard after this a murmur of voices, but I could not make out more distinctly the words that were spoken; but I maid myself "Dont laugh for its surely the truth," the sure that ther were a number of men concealed in the packing hold. Who they were, Now Ben's very manner was proof enough or how they came there I could not imagine. to me that something had happened out of I sat there half an hour or more after this, but the usual line, and I saw, too, that he was not could hear no more, save occasionally that low alone in his fears.
